STEREOTYPES WITHOUT AND WITHIN: IDENTIFYING AND DISMANTLING IMPLICIT BIASES IN HEALTHCARE

Most healthcare providers want to offer excellent care to all their patients, regardless of race or ethnicity, but research shows that there are disparities in both health and healthcare nonetheless. People of color are less likely to receive the highest standard of care, on average, and more likely to sense that their healthcare provider is just "going through the motions" with them. Implicit bias is one reason for that. So what can we do? How can providers do their very best for all the patients in their care? Bring your questions and your comments and we will explore this important issue together.

SPEAKER BIO:

Charles (Chuck) Green is professor of psychology at Hope College, currently in his 38th year with Hope. He is a social psychologist with a particular focus on race in America.

He currently teaches and writes full-time in the psychology department. Previously, he spent seven years directing the college's Carl Frost Center for Social Science Research. He spent fourteen years as the director of the Phelps Scholars Program, an academic and residential opportunity for first-year students interested in race and culture, and he continues to teach with the program. Nearly 100 students each year decide to be Phelps Scholars, taking classes together, living in the same hall, attending workshops, going on trips, and developing the skills to lead and serve in a global society.

He gives talks and workshops regularly to various community groups. His recent speeches at Hope, for the lecture series on faith, race, and community, can be found on the college's YouTube channel.
